Transco & Westvaco Improve Rights Of Way

Maintaining pipeline rights of way has always been serious business for Transco as well as for the numerous men and machines who daily must care for the 4,248 miles of right of way.

Last spring, however, Foreman Robert M. Honeycutt of Appomattox and his crew and Foreman J. R. Rothgeb of Culpeper, and his crew went one step further in grooming their respective rights of way.

Under the auspices of Transco's management, the Pipe Line Department, and Division Supt. Rex L. Ford of Charlottesville, these men carried out their part of an agreement entered into with Westvaco (formerly West Virginia Pulp & Paper Company). And, although the labor involved was relatively simple, both companies hope that this one small step will have far-reaching effects.

When Forester Chuck Matheny, Westvaco's game management coordinator in Lynchburg, first contacted Reo Ford about the prospects of planting game-food patches along Transco's right of way through Westvaco-owned timberland, he wasn't sure just what the reception would be. But as it turned out, Ford was enthusiastically receptive to the proposition, and an agreement was reached that being that Westvaco would supply the seed and fertilizer and Transco would furnish the labor.

Last May Westvaco delivered about 100 pounds of seed and 1,200 pounds of fertilizer to the crews at Appomattox and Culpeper. It took two men of Honeycutt's crew about one day to sow the twelve game patches on the right of way for which they are responsible. It took two of Rothgebs men one-half day to plant their eight patches.

Now nearing maturity, the crops planted in one-tenth acre strips provide a game browse on the edge of Transco's right of way thereby giving wildlife three basic requisites for survival: escape cover, nesting areas, and food.

According to Matheny, the particular grasses and plants sown in this project were recommended by the Division of Game and Inland Fisheries of Virginia. Crops such as cowpeas, German millet, browntop millet, soybeans, maize, buckwheat, oats, Korean lespedeza and serica lespedeza were planted for wild turkey, quail, grouse and doves, as well as songbirds, rabbits, squirrels and deer - not to mention numerous insects. These animals, in turn, attract other animals and an ecological balance is maintained.

Although Transco always seeks the advice of county agents and, where possible, replants its right of way according to the wishes of the landowners, the idea of game-food planting on the land through which it passes is relatively novel. It's rather a first for Westvaco, too.

For years Westvaco has prided itself in helping maintain an ecological balance on the lands it owns. Its business is timber and to insure the continuance of a healthy, productive forest, it must protect the other forms of life in nature's interdependent chain. Thus, the company strives for stream improvement, erosion control, and maintenance of all wildlife species - not just the endangered ones.

In striking out on this new ecological endeavor, Matheny explains that he approached several utilities with proposals similar to the one entered into with Transco. A few smaller distribution companies agreed to participate, but it is hoped that more of the larger concerns will follow Transco's lead. If so, various utility rights of way, which are now permanent openings in the forest, will once again become productive.

Inspecting one of the twenty game-food patches now nearing maturity on Transco's right of way through Westvaco-owned Virginia timberland are (left to right): Pipe Line Foreman Robert M. Honeycutt of Appomattox; Westvaco's Manager of Virginia Woodlands Joe Crockett, Lynchburg; Pipe Line Foreman J. R. Rothgeb of Culpeper; and Westvaco's Game Management Coordinator Chuck Matheny of Lynchburg. The crops provide certain forms of wildlife with food, escape cover, and nesting areas just on the edge of the forest.

Transco's lines now pass through 42 acres of Westvaco's prime Virginia timberland as well as through some of its acreage in Georgia and South Carolina. Cooperation in this project created more work on the part of the pipeline crews - tilling, seeding, mowing around, in addition to reseeding next year if the project is continued. But this participation is just one more way Transco strives to serve its publics and casts a forward glance to the publics of the future.

There's an open gate at the end of the road
Through which each must go alone,
And there in a light we cannot see,
Our Father claims His own;

That a loving God knows best.
